AutoCAD has several features, including 3D modeling, vector and raster graphics editing, schematic design, documentation, and rendering. A typical AutoCAD installation includes the software itself, a power supply, a mouse, a keyboard, a monitor, and mouse pad. Creating and modifying documents is the heart of AutoCAD usage. When an AutoCAD user draws a line, circles, arcs, or rectangles, he or she is using the software to create a digital image or drawing. In the case of a drawing, that image is of a geometric shape. Drawing in AutoCAD is typically done in two ways, with or without layers. AutoCAD drawings are organized into one or more layers, which enable the user to select the objects in the drawing, apply a new drawing, modify the drawing, and add or subtract objects from a drawing. Layers can be used with or without groups. Layers can be created from scratch, existing drawings, or a template or master file. Layer visibility is used to determine which objects, if any, a user sees. Layers are typically organized into three groups: Visible layers, Hidden layers, and AutoCAD Users. Layers are not visible until they are turned on by a user. AutoCAD provides a way to manage layers and their associated visibility. AutoCAD has three layer modes: Visible, Hidden, and AutoCAD Users. Note: AutoCAD requires a minimum of three CAD layers in order to function. The AutoCAD Users group is automatically hidden. Layers can be turned on and off, including temporarily hiding a layer. A user cannot change a layer's visibilty when it is hidden. Layers can be included, or excluded, from a drawing by using the Select tool or by using Layer Properties. All objects on a layer are included in a group, which are then included in a drawing by using the Group command. You can use the Select tool to modify the layer group. You cannot modify the layer group in the Drawing Editor. The Layer Properties window contains properties for each layer, such as name, category, and visibility. You can use the Set command to change layer properties. You can use the Select tool to select objects and create groups. You can use the
