The development of the human central nervous system (CNS) begins in the early stages of embryonic development, although the specific developmental program for each specific subtype of neuron begins in more detail during the second month of gestation. Thus, the development of the CNS is accomplished during the first seven weeks of the embryonic life by a co-ordinated process that is followed by a differential survival of the pre-programmed cells. Moreover, the majority of human neuropsychiatric diseases that affect the CNS seem to originate early in development. This chapter reviews the most recent data about the developmental processes that underlie nervous system disorders affecting the CNS. In particular, a discussion about the recent discovery of a pathway that represses epigenetic modifications in neural progenitor cells, including limbic and cortical neurons, is of particular interest in the pathogenesis of neural and mental disease. Moreover, the relevance of RNA metabolism, in both neurons and glia, in various neurodevelopmental processes is also reviewed. Finally, an update of recent findings on the role of neural cell derived neurotrophic factor (NT-3) in the pathogenesis of neurodegenerative disorders is included.Q: Does firebase.auth.AuthCredential get expired every time or when the application is closed?
