Over the years, several automated systems and methods have been developed for counting items or objects or for identifying selected object characteristics, such as size, shape or color. For example, object counting or identification systems have been used to identify the number of defective objects in a production line. However, these systems normally require the operator to manually scan or move the object or items under some type of camera or sensor to count the number of objects or to identify characteristics of the objects. For example, some of these prior systems move the item for counting or identify characteristics of objects by applying lights, such as infrared, visible or ultraviolet lights to the item. Examples of such prior counting or identifying systems are disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 4,438,038 (Stuart et al.) and U.S. Pat. No. 4,872,020 (Chin et al.). According to these prior counting or identifying systems, an operator manually scans or moves the objects under the camera or sensor. The system moves the item or the objects past the camera or sensor, which captures a series of images of each item or objects, and determines the object count or identifies the characteristics based on the number of images. Although the prior object counting or identifying systems provide certain benefits, they may be difficult to operate. For example, the operator may not be able to properly move the object or items past the camera or sensor, which may result in erroneous counts or may provide unacceptable amounts of time and effort. In addition, the operator may not be able to properly position the objects or move the objects in a proper location within the scanning area to provide accurate counting or identifying. In addition, when an object or item is automatically fed and then stopped for scanning, the object or item may be misaligned or distorted due to elasticity of the material from which the object or item is constructed. Therefore, the prior object counting or identifying systems may produce inaccurate results or take an unacceptable amount of time to count or
